

PROTECT YOURSELF FROM FRAUD

Know how to identify fake GED® credentials online

In an era where everything's on the Internet, high school diplomas and credentials are easily found. But the GED® test and credential are not online.

There are dozens—even hundreds—of websites offering high school diplomas, GED® credentials, and other degrees. What they don't tell you is their “accredited degree” is virtually worthless. These sites are looking to make a quick buck at your expense—and they're charging anywhere from $200 to $1200 to do it. Don't fall into their trap. Learn more about how to spot a scam, and where to earn a real GED® credential.

Have you been a victim of GED® test or credential fraud?

Report fraud to GED Testing Service here.

At GED Testing Service, we're trying to protect our national testing program and people like you who need the credential to attend college or get a job. We will track reports and work with officials like the BBB and state attorneys general to take action against offenders.

In order for an official complaint to be opened, you must file a complaint with a local official like the police, state attorney general offices, or the Better Business Bureau.
